Also, it doesn't have to be WP, just something reliable that the client can use to easily post news, new items, events, etc.. I took a quick look at this page but I don't know much about PHP, yet Plus, that still would leave the Big Cartel site as a potential problem.. pngMy question really is, what's the easiest way of doing this?Can I just drop those elements into an iframe or.

Pretty much all of the 'design' takes place in the header/footer and the CMS/shopping cart would be between those.. Perhaps that would help make it easier? I figured I could just remove all of the theme's navigation, etc.. Basically, after spending a quarter learning about RWD, I agreed to do a responsive redesign of a very simple, 4-5 page site for a friend's retail business.. No problem But, as soon as we started talking, the subject of a blog came up, as well as their Big Cartel shopping cart.

Worst case scenario, they don't mind the shopping cart opening in a new window, styled similarly to the main site.. Any help would be greatly appreciated! :)Bloggers and artists will find lots to love in Big Cartel, an e-commerce platform.. True to its artistic origins, Big Cartel offers some lovely, clean templates to use.. I know there are responsive themes available for both and I've found a few that look promising, but what I'm wondering is; Do these play well inside another responsive site? I am actually learning WP from the ground up next quarter but, the plan was to have the site up by the New Year. Roxio Toast For Mac
